The Columbia had hardly docked before the steamer Corona, from Eureka. Cal., signaled that she had passed through immense quantities of wreckage at 3:30 o'clock this morning at a point about thirty miles southeast of Point Arena. Investigation of the Corona's report, however, indicates that the wreckage she passed through was a portion of the deckload of the steam schooner Alcatraz, from Greenwood Landing, Cal., which was lost during a storm on the morning of March 8, together with some of her rigging. The Alcatraz suffered some minor damage, but arrived in port safely several days ago.

There can be no connection between the wreckage reported by the Corona and the alleged disaster reported by the lighthouse keeper at Point Reyes, and that while the Point Reyes is that there was no disaster off Point Reyes, and that while the Point Reyes, and that while the Point Reyes, and that while the Point Reyes, sel sending them up was in grave danger.

Observer Thomas of the weather bureau station at Point Reyes, who was the first to report the sudden disappearance of a vessel, after hiowing three blasts and firing a rocket, is accounted a most reliable authority among all captains and ship owners, but many of them are of the opinion that in this instance he mistook the meaning of the ship's whistles and signals.

The agents of the Meteor are of the dights and signals seen were those of the Meteor, given to attract attention so that the vessel would be reported. The three blasts are interpreted by them as being the usual salute to signify that all is well.
